High performance. Delivered.

From apartheid to corporate success, I've always been the best I can be

When you know yourself and you believe in yourself, the world is your oyster. Nobody else matters.

Continual learning is important to me because I come from a background where it was difficult to even get the basic foundation and training. Growing up in apartheid South Africa, black people were not considered important to get an education. So, once you understand the struggle of how hard it was to achieve the basic education, you then hunger for more. You want more because you want to be the best, and to be the best where I come from, you have to keep on studying, to keep on improving yourself.

My role model is my mother. My mother raised five girls. She put all five of us through private school because she was determined to get the best education South Africa could get for her.

My mother taught me to be assertive. I am who I am because of her. My mother taught me about the value of education and what I would get if I went all the way with it.

For me to be in the position I am in now is beyond what my parents ever thought was possible. At the end of the day, what I am learning from experience is that if you want something badly enough, you go for it.
