Stacy Brown- Philpot, Task Rabbit

I'm really positive about the future of work. I believe that humans have ability to be creative and use our imagination, so as automation, sort of takes certain jobs away, other ones will be created.

Carrie Ask, Levis

I think the workforce in the future and for the foreseeable future from my vantage point is going to require continuous learning, you need to really understand what you deeply enjoy and what your craft is and what skills you want to master, but also invest in staying current.

Jake Schwartz, General Assembly

Every dollar spent on learning for your employees is either talent acquisition or talent retention. You can radically re-skill existing employees with new skills, and in doing so you could actually save costs on the talent acquisition side, but also build a culture of lifelong learning at the same time.

Stephane Kasriel, Upwork

This idea that technology is exponential and therefore skills ups the lessons will only accelerate makes us more responsible to re-skill ourselves, re-skill our workforce more often today than we did five years ago, and frankly, more often in five years than we do today. It's the new normal.
