

MOK JUANG WEI - ADRENALINE JUNKIE, INDUSTRY CHANGE- MAKER

VIDEO TRANSCRIPT

When I'm not at work I am very much of an adrenaline junkie. I enjoy mountain biking most weekends, I still wake up at 6:30 and get out there at sunrise and it feels good to get wind in your face and just be out there rather than in front of a computer.

I've been with Accenture for 24 years, it's actually been an incredible journey. I started out as an analyst in what used to be called our process competency where we did business process design and today I look after the resources industries for Southeast Asia. The biggest challenge for a lot of these companies that I work with is because they've been around for five six seven decades and they grew up and mature in an environment where mail takes three, four days to get there they need to change they need to radically be different in five years time to be able to continue to attract the top talent out there and to be relevant to their customers. Accenture's work is about helping our clients be the best, it is helping them adapt to the changing environment and escalating consumer expectations. We're able to bring together what was traditionally in consulting and what is now in the last few years in technology and digital to really make that happen for our clients.

My role in Accenture has changed. Today I spend a lot of my time helping Accenture be our best and a big part of that is growing our people and ensuring that the analysts that join us today can be future leaders in the firm.
