In conversation with

Yann Brillat-Savarin

Chief Strategy & Sustainability Officer

at FORVIA

Jean-Nicolas Brun: Could you give me one word that describes you the best?

Yann Brillat-Savarin: I would say chameleon. I think that I've developed the ability to adjust to changing environments, to different environments. I worked in operations and strategy in large companies, in smaller companies and publicly listed companies and privately owned.

Jean-Nicolas Brun: If I could click on this strategy big picture. The acquisition of HELLA by Faurecia was really big news last summer and it is still in the sector. Could you tell us what those synergies will be bringing to the market and to FORVIA for the future?

Yann Brillat-Savarin: Well, first, the acquisition of HELLA is a major step forward in our ambition to become a global technology leader in the automotive field. And now with this move, we have created the seventh largest automotive supplier and this combined group is very well positioned to be a global leader in technology and sustainable mobility.

In parallel we are the first automotive company with net zero target approved by SBTi (Science Based Targets initiative) and now with together Faurecia and HELLA we want to reach net zero mission by 2045.
