“Let the morning bring me word of your unfailing love. Show me the way.”

My name is Stephanie Tai and I'm the PMO lead for the Health & Public Sector from the Singapore Accenture office.

I've always been passionate about music, not just from a singing perspective but also coordinating the entire band with the musicians. And, most recently, I've also been involved in songwriting.

So all these are very similar to how I apply myself at work because I'm also overseeing a team and that's where the time management, discipline and team management all come in.

This is my latest project that I was involved in. It's actually an album of original written songs from members of my church.

It's called “Clothe Us With Power.” All the songs are downloadable, free of charge, on this website.

In Singapore, especially in this 21st century, I find that challenges for women in the workplace have not been as much, compared to the past, because a lot of successful women have already paved the way for us in the workforce.

Having said that, many years ago, in my previous job, I was faced with a challenge where inappropriate behavior was directed towards me as a woman.

Having overcome that, it made me stronger and more confident in myself. I was able to share this and encourage other women who have experienced the same thing before. The Accenture band is part of a special interest group initiative. I thought, "Oh how cool it would be to have our own band, you know, for our office to have our own band." So I approached my boss. Then we started to recruit people who were interested.

There are a lot of people in the company who have many other talents outside. Music is just something people connect with and to be able to share that with our colleagues, I think that is really fulfilling and rewarding for me.
