I am looking forward to the opportunity to network with peers who are like-minded.
Learning from other people. Meeting other people. I know this program is pretty huge and we are a big community.
Welcome to the first ever ASEP Leadership Summit. We could not be, let's get a round of applause.
Yeah, I think it is great to, you know, create a network of people that have similar goals and are all very focused and driven, are good students, it's exciting.
To meet new people, to answer your questions and really jumpstart, accelerate those leadership qualities that are in you today.
And the more you understand, kind of where your strengths lie, you can position yourself in roles that will really accentuate those strengths.
I feel like I was able to add what I felt like I could add on top of what other people were talking about. I realized that listening was just as important as adding my own ideas, so it was really valuable for me.

It breaks it down and makes it just much better to work in a team, like you're very much comfortable with everybody.

It is real interesting because you can sort of transfer that skill set to working in a professional setting and sort of be free to share your own ideas, not be embarrassed about what other people think.

I am loving it. It’s definitely, I am learning a lot. Learning more about leadership.

The biggest thing I've learned this weekend is that diversity and inclusion drives the agenda for Accenture.

Learning about everyone’s backgrounds and their journey coming here and learning more about inclusion.

I learned that Accenture is more than just a company, it is a place where friends live, play and work together and where you can bring your whole self to work every day.

You know, we want to make sure that we’re creating a place where each and every one of us can demonstrate their uniqueness and that we all feel that we belong.
